

Mermaids

Rose Session 572 - Sunday, June 16, 2013

Good evening, Rose. We'd appreciate your insights into the subject of mermaids, or aquatic apes, that Paul is so enamored with today, thanks to a television program we saw about it. According to Elias, woolly mammoths exist in the Greenland-Iceland region, so why not aquatic beings who have evolved different than our land-loving ancestors? It certainly seems plausible.

There are not only woolly mammoths in that area, dear one. Exactly what is something of a new territory for us, so let us begin by first realizing a bit about who you are to us, so you can sense what it is about these beasts that is so very attractive.

When you were small, you fantasized about all sorts of wonderful creatures: birds that had many feathers of different colors – more than you ever thought possible. Winged creatures that had a sense of play that would pick up small children and carry them away when they were bad. Large rodents that were as scary as anything you've dreamed of. Do these things exist? Yes, in your reality, no in their reality if you consider their reality as something outside of you. They are secondary creatures that were in many ways disseminated with your own thoughts when you dreamed them up.

Now, we're not saying mermaids are not real. We are only trying to allow your best dreams to be considered when you realize the answers in ways that bring you the best understanding. When you dream, you sense the world around you foremost, then learn to adopt the potentials around you to create the reality you know in your world. There are not any reasons to feel that the world is in any way different than what you dream. In fact, there are more significant things going on in your reality than you can think of. Hence, this is why you dream.

The Dreamwalkers have the dreaming going on all the time. When you dream, you tune into the Dreamwalker space to learn the potentials for the reality creation that are your best intentions in play. There's reason to consider mermaids as something that you wish to bring into the world now. Whether or not they existed before doesn't matter. That's how reality creation is. Now we're going to add here quickly that there is some truth to reality creation in the sense of evolution. This explains how you create things in your past as well as your future, because that's how you think about things.

You don't really need evolution to explain mermaids, hence our talking earlier about them. But scientifically speaking, you have created potentials for dreaming them into being through your observations about things. In this case, mermaids are compatible with your definition of evolution; therefore, you create them as we speak.

Now how's that for imaginary friends? Indeed they are the best things you might imagine – coming to your shores to help promote peace as well as healthy seas. They are found in the areas of the farther areas of Scotland as well as the Arctic that you imagined they are. They are real now because you just put them there in your past; about fifty million years they've been on your planet.

Now what would you say to a mermaid if you saw one? "Hello cousin!" So do so.
